Wise Selection

A massive avalanche of information from all ends of the earth pours daily into the Central Intelligence Agency. It is, however, useless unless properly evaluated by someone familiar with Communist methods.

Vice Adm. William F. Raborn, selected as the new head of CIA, has a great understanding of Communist tactics from years of military service and an impressive administrative talent. These are qualifications that so quickly will adapt him to leadership in the demands of our top intelligence system.

As head of the Polaris program shortly before his retirement, Adm. Raborn completed the program several years ahead of schedule, introducing new management techniques that are widely copied. He speaks with equal facility to military men, administrators or scientists.
